Not illustrated. 1852 Excerpt: ...at least from them: but how far they can be practically shown to exercise an Henry Colt, Esq. question indeed. I believe both a trade collection and a picture collection teach the public, and the public knowledge influences both trade and pictures. 30th Jan. 1852. 68J. You said that other countries had these collections for the purposes of trade, and you referred to Dresden and Vienna. Observing that other countries have them, and that this country has managed to carry on a considerable trade without them, do you think it is desirable that we should now follow the example of those countries, and institute these museums in order to copy them?--I think it is; the leaning of my opinion is decidedly that it is. There is the Ambras collection at Vienna, the Green Vault collection at Dresden, the Japanese collection at Dresden, and the Historical collection there; and I think that although these appear now torpid slumbering tilings in Germany, our manufacturers and traders would get a number of hints from them if we had such things here; and I should very much like to see such collections made. If we try to find analogies for these things we may see how private individuals deal with them. They think it a pleasure to have bronzes, pictures, specimens of china, glass, and so on, in their houses; it gives them gratification and knowledge And even if you view it in that light I think there can be little doubt that what a private individual has a pleasure in amassing the public would also have a similar pleasure in; I think that you find this to be the feet, that the manufacturers who know most about these collections are those whose manufactures are decidedly the best. I take a case within my own knowledge, the case
