

After the Liberation: The American Administration of the Concentration Camp at Dachau

This study examines the Nazi concentration camp at Dachau just after its liberation by American forces on April 29, 1945. It investigates the decisions made and actions undertaken by the Americans, the reasoning behind them, and the physical, emotional, and psychological effects that they had on the former prisoners. The primary goals of the post-liberation administration of Dachau were the rehabilitation and repatriation of the inmates and the containment of a typhus epidemic. Inmate perceptions of the American presence grew less optimistic during the crucial first few days, as the careful and methodical procedures of the Americans stood in marked contrast to the emotional day of liberation. Also, the Americans could not avoid certain continuities with the camps past, such as its physical appearance, a high death rate, and seeming similarities with the SS administration. Secondary debates are addressed, such as the question of which U.S. Army unit actually liberated the camp and of the functionality of Dachau's gas chamber, and possibilities for further study are discussed.
