Quoted by Dean Stanley, in Sinai and Palestine. PItOPYLON AT KARNAK. It has been already mentioned that the Egyptians built their houses of perishable materials, but that their temples and tombs were constructed on the grandest scale, and of the most enduring character. How true this is of the Theban temples we have seen. We now turn to the tombs, which are scarcely less wonderful in their extent and magnificence. They are constructed in the hager, that is, a rock, and refers to the rocky precipices which rise from the fertile banks of the river. Crossing the western plain, here about three miles in width, and leaving behind us the seated Colossi, and the temples of Kilrnah, MedinetAbu, and the Ramesseum, we enter a savage gorge. The walls of rock on either side of the ravine, utterly denuded of soil, glow in the pitiless sunshine, like the mouth of a furnace. Overhead rises a pyramidal mass of rock, which forms a striking feature in the landscape, and commands from its summit a striking view of the Nile Valley and Desert. No tree, or blade of grass, or drop of water, or living thing is visible as the travelers pass along in the blinding glare. This gorge leads us to the Biban el Moluk, or tombs of the kings. The rocks are honeycombed with sepulchres, which run far into the mountain sides. Here ¹ I Kings xiv. 25; ² Chron. xii. 3 9. GREAT HALL AT KARNAK. the Theban
