Excerpt: ... Harpers Monthly. 91: 767-75. October, 1895. The Future in Relation to American Naval Power. Captain A. T. Mahan. That the United States navy should within the last dozen years have been almost wholly recast upon more modern lines is not, in itself alone, a fact that should cause comment, or give rise to questions about its future career or sphere of action. If this country needs, or shall ever need, a navy at all, indisputably in 1883 the hour had come when the time-worn hulks of that day, mostly the honored but superannuated survivors of the civil war should drop out of the ranks, submit to well-earned retirement or inevitable dissolution, and allow their places to be taken by other vessels, capable of performing the duties to which they themselves were no longer adequate. It is therefore unlikely that there underlay this recreation of the navy--for such in truth it was--any more reconidite cause than the urgent necessity of possessing tools wholly fit for the work which war-ships are called upon to do. The thing had to be done, if the national fleet was to be other than an impotent parody of naval force, a costly effigy of straw. But concurrently with the process of rebuilding, there has been concentrated upon the development of the new service a degree of attention greater than can be attributed even to the voracious curiosity of this age of newsmongering and of interviewers. This attention is in some quarters undisguisedly reluctant and hostile, in others not only friendly but expectant, in both cases betraying a latent impression that there is, between the appearance of the newcomer and the era upon which we are now entering, something in common. If such coincidence

there be, however, it is indicative not of a deliberate purpose, but of a commen...
