

The Natural History of Man: A Course of Elementary Lectures (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from The Natural History of Man: A Course of Elementary Lectures

The study of the races of mankind in recent times, by the method of Natural History, has given rise to an important branch of knowledge known as the science of Anthropology. Societies have been established in various countries for its promotion, and many learned works have been written upon it in different languages. The subject has, moreover, now become one of such great public interest, that it is important it should be presented in its rudiments for the benefit of beginners. In this country, especially, where all the great races of the world - European, African, Asiatic, and American - are thrown together on an immense scale, and practical problems of great difficulty arise from the interaction of diverse foreign populations, it is desirable that broad scientific views of the subject should be widely disseminated. The author of this little volume of lectures, Prof. de Quatrefages, of Paris, is one of the eminent founders of Anthropological Science, and he has also shown himself to be a most successful popular teacher of the subject. In the clearness and simplicity of his statements, the felicity and fullness of his illustrations, the colloquial vivacity of his style, and the skill with which he brings large questions within the range of ordinary apprehension, he certainly has but few equals.
