Not illustrated. 1869 Excerpt: ... already been said, and we therefore hasten on to the consideration of that culminating point of old German poetry, the Nibelungen Lied, or Lay of the Nibelungen. Tacitus, 532, 533. The Nibelungen Lied seems not to have been reduced to its present form before the beginning of the thirteenth century. It was then the old singer opened with: I sing of loves and wassailings, if ye will lend your ears, Of bold mens bloody combatings, and gentle ladies tears. But his themes or subjects have been carried far back into previous centuries; some claiming that in the Nibeluagen, under more or less defacement, lie fragments, scattered like mysterious runes, yet still in part decypherable, of the earliest thoughts of men. That its fiction grew out of a religious or philosophical mythus, which, in subsequent ages mingling with vague tradition of real events, was wrought into a story or narrative of earthly transactions. It embodies the oldest traditions of modern Europe, and unless we except the songs of the Celtic bard, Ossian, is the oldest European poem. Its roots reach far back even to the great northern emigrations, and are ramified through successive layers of centuries, drawing nourishment from each. It seems to be the a great prerogative of a legend that, instead of being a grand artistic composition, the creation of an individual mind,<sup>1</sup> its operation extends through many varying periods of time, and many generations of men and poets, like the spirit of undying nature, not owning any single earthly master, nor formed to bend beneath his arbitrary will. The German poet, in this hallowed grove of early poetry, has gathered for himself a crown of undying verdure, twined of the oak leaves of his
